Alaska Farmers Market Association (AFMA), is a nonprofit organization committed to supporting and promoting vibrant and sustainable farmers markets, farm stands, community supported agriculture businesses (CSAs), and food hubs throughout Alaska.

Farmers markets are springing up all over the state. While Alaska’s short growing season and cold climate offer many challenges, farmers markets are thriving!

Since 2006, the number of farmers markets in Alaska has more than quadrupled, growing from 13 markets in 2006 to 41 in 2017. In 2021, the Alaska Farmers Market Association (AFMA) counted 56, with more in the works.

AFMA lists those 56 markets, along with local food hubs, CSAs, and farm stands, in our statewide directory so Alaskans and out-of-state visitors alike know where to shop for healthy, local foods.

We support farmers markets statewide with a robust library of resources. We encourage new farmers markets and strengthen existing ones through our new Alaska Farmers Markets Toolkit, funded by a 2020 Specialty Crop Block Grant. This resource provides market managers with the tools they need to start, enhance, or support farmers markets, and will improve food security in our state by providing access to healthy, local foods, right within their community.
Farmers markets are good for farmers and good for the communities they serve.

Farmers markets provide both social and economic benefits to farmers and communities. Farmers markets provide space for farmers to connect with consumers and capture retail dollars for their fresh, high-quality, locally grown and produced products.

For communities, farmers markets are family-friendly, community-building events that bring neighbors together, attract retail activity to surrounding businesses, create forums for civic education and involvement, and provide direct access to Alaska’s agricultural bounty.

Markets, in addition to CSAs, food hubs, and farm stands, improve access to healthy local foods by providing regular opportunities for purchasing and interaction between farmers and local communities, as well as supporting a more equitable local food system through participation in food assistance programs like SNAP (Supplemental Nutrition Assistance Program—also known as QUEST in Alaska), Senior Nutrition, and WIC (Women Infants Children).

When you support your local farmers markets, you help to:

• Create a sense of community by buying locally and cooking and eating locally-grown food.
• Build a healthier lifestyle by buying, cooking, and eating wholesome and nutritious food.
• Directly foster a more food-secure future through Alaska agriculture.
• Protect Alaska’s precious agricultural lands from development.

Many Alaskans choose to buy local food because:

• The produce tastes better! Cool nights make vegetables sweeter and more delicious than anything grown in hotter climates. Vegetables grown nearby are fresher than produce shipped from Outside, which also enhances taste.
• Your produce will stay fresh much longer after you buy it, because it is so fresh to begin with.
• The transportation costs of buying local food are much lower than buying produce that has been shipped from the Lower 48. You conserve all kinds of energy by buying local food!
• You support local farmers and ensure that farming and local food production will remain viable in Alaska.
